SEVEN CARDS, ONE DECK – JEFF

The Power of Distribution

Nothing is ever finished until it arrives.

A song exists the moment it's written, but it only matters the moment someone hears it. A cure exists in a lab notebook, but it only saves lives once it reaches a pharmacy shelf in a village nobody important has ever visited. Creation is the spark. Distribution is the fire that spreads.

Jeff did not invent commerce. He did not invent books, or shipping, or even the internet. What he understood, earlier and more completely than almost anyone, was that the future would not belong to those who made the most things. It would belong to those who shortened the distance between wanting and having.

That is a strange kind of power. It does not announce itself. No one erects a monument to a delivery truck. No one writes an anthem for a warehouse. And yet warehouses now hold more influence over daily life than most parliaments.

Here is the part that unsettles people, if they think about it long enough: distribution does not care what it distributes. It moves poetry and propaganda with the same indifferent efficiency. It moves medicine and misinformation down the same pipe. The channel has no conscience — only throughput. Which means the real moral weight of this era falls not on the makers, but on whoever controls the gate.

For most of history, the person who owned the field owned the wealth. Then the person who owned the factory owned the wealth. Now the person who owns the route — the algorithm, the platform, the last mile — owns something even the factory owner never had: the power to decide what most people will see today, and what they will never see at all.

That is not a small power. It is the newest form of an old one, and it deserves to be looked at without either worship or panic.

There is a cost buried in all this convenience, and it does not fall on the customer. It falls on the maker, quietly, one negotiation at a time. Every creator who wants to reach everyone eventually discovers that “everyone” has a price, and the price is paid in control. You keep the idea. You surrender the terms.

I have spent enough of my own life moving things — products, trust, people, stories — across borders and languages to know this isn't cynicism. It's just the shape of scale. Nothing grows past a certain size without beginning to answer to something outside itself.

So this is the card of Jeff. Not the warehouse. Not the algorithm. Not even the fortune.

The power of distribution — the quiet, uncelebrated force that decides, every single day, which stories finish their journey and which ones die in the drawer.
